Directions (22-30): Read the following passage and answer the given questions.

Mathew Varghese owned a mid-sized fashion store in a busy market, and for nearly a decade it had depended on two brands: Crestline, a label of formal shirts and trousers, and Maple & Co., a range of linen dresses. By the end of last year, neither was doing well. Office workers had begun dressing more casually, and Crestline's stiff collars stayed on the hangers. Maple & Co. had raised its wholesale prices twice in eighteen months, leaving Mathew a margin of barely 6 percent on each dress. Profits were shrinking every quarter.

When his long-serving assistant retired, Mathew decided he needed a change, not a copy of the man who had left. He hired Rini, who had spent two years selling clothes at a crowded street market. Her way of viewing the business was different. Mathew saw a store that had to clear its existing stock; Rini saw one that could become the first stop for young shoppers in the market.

Mathew counted what was sold; Rini watched what customers picked up, tried on and put back. Within a month, she noticed a pattern. Young shoppers walked past the formal racks and asked for jeans, skirts and casual tops that the store did not stock. Many left empty-handed. Rini argued that the store was not short of customers but short of what those customers wanted.

Mathew was wary of a large investment. Instead of dropping the two struggling brands at once, they decided to _____ with a small batch of denim and printed skirts displayed near the entrance. The batch sold out in eleven days. Encouraged, they added cargo trousers, co-ord sets, belts and canvas bags, sourcing several items from local manufacturers to keep costs low. Crestline was reduced to a single rack for loyal office buyers, and Mathew stopped reordering Maple & Co.

The new lines gave shoppers a far wider choice, and Rini refreshed the displays every fortnight so that regular visitors always found something new. She also recorded which sizes and colours sold fastest, so that reorders matched demand rather than guesswork.

The results came steadily. Within ten months, monthly revenue had risen by 40 percent, and the store's profit margin climbed from 8 percent to 21 percent. Customers under twenty-five, once a rarity, now made up more than half of all buyers.

Mathew admits that the turnaround began with listening rather than spending. The store had never lacked footfall; it simply needed someone who could see what the people walking in were looking for.

Q22. Which of the following best expresses the central idea of the passage?

- (a) Established brands lose relevance over time and should be replaced without delay.
- (b) Younger employees understand fashion better than experienced store owners.
