Directions (19-27): Read the following passage and answer the given questions.

Ramesh Kumar had lived in the same small house on the outskirts of Nagpur for nearly thirty years. The house was modest but clean, surrounded by a small vegetable patch that his wife Savitri tended with great care every single morning. The one problem that had followed the family through all those decades was water. Every day, without exception, Ramesh woke up before five in the morning, picked up two large plastic containers, and walked nearly half a kilometre to the community hand pump to collect enough water for the day's cooking, cleaning, and washing. It was exhausting, time-consuming work, and it left him with very little energy for anything else by the time the rest of the neighbourhood had barely begun their day.

His neighbours had long accepted this routine as simply the way things were in their part of the city. But Ramesh had never quite made his peace with it. He had heard through a local newspaper that the municipal corporation was running a scheme to provide direct pipe water connections to households in underserved areas of the city. He was determined to apply, regardless of how complicated the process turned out to be.

The process, as it happened, was anything but simple. Forms needed to be filled carefully, documents needed to be arranged and verified, and multiple visits to the municipal office were required before anyone paid serious attention to his application. Officers were busy, queues were long, and the paperwork seemed to multiply with every visit. Several of his neighbours had tried the same route before and given up halfway through.

Ramesh did not give up. For nearly five months, he visited the municipal office every single week without fail. He was always polite but never passive, never _____ without asking clearly for an update on his file. Slowly, the officer in charge began recognising his face and greeting him by name. One afternoon, the approval finally came through.

The day the plumber connected the pipe to Ramesh's kitchen tap was one of the quietest celebrations the neighbourhood had seen in years. Savitri filled a glass of water directly from the tap, handed it to Ramesh without a word, and watched him drink it slowly, standing in his own kitchen, smiling in a way she had not seen for a very long time.
